The illustration shows a vertical cross-section of a human spine. It features seven distinct cervical vertebrae at the top, each with a large, curved upper process (lamina) and a smaller lower process (transverse process). Below these are twelve thoracic vertebrae, which have prominent, flared, heart-shaped processes called 'processus costales' that give rise to ribs. The thoracic spine ends at the sacrum. The lumbar spine begins with five vertebrae that are much larger than the previous ones, characterized by their thick, triangular processes. The sacrum is shown as a large, triangular bone at the bottom, and the coccyx is a small, curved bone at the very bottom right.
